PVL in infants is also associated with an increased incidence of cognitive and psychiatric disabilities in later life, suggesting that this disorder can be a forerunner of dementia and psychiatric disorders in the elderly. Further, the incidence of PVL in children has increased recently. In rodents, neonatal hypoxia-ischemia (HI) injury can induce PVL-like injury and a decrease in myelination that persists throughout life. HI induced PVL-like injury is associated with the loss of oligodendrocyte (OL) progenitors and the consequent decrease in oligodendrocyte production of myelin-related proteins. The vulnerability of the OL progenitors to HI injury is due to a lack of compensatory angiogenic responses. Administration of anti-angiogenic factors can prevent HI induced PVL-like injury in adult rodents, and a similar approach can also prevent and reverse PVL in the developing brain. Thus, current treatment strategies that target angiogenesis can prevent and reverse PVL. It is likely that these strategies would be beneficial in treating PVL in the human brain. Although it is clear that anti-angiogenic factors are likely to be beneficial in preventing or reversing PVL in humans, no currently available agent has the necessary safety and side-effects profiles to make it suitable for clinical use. Therefore, an important aim of the proposed studies is to develop a safe anti-angiogenic compound that can be used clinically. A potential compound that will be evaluated in the proposed studies is quinacrine, which has been reported to have a wide range of effects including anti-angiogenic and anti-viral effects. In addition, quinacrine has been reported to be a potent angiostatic compound that does not inhibit hematopoietic progenitor cell proliferation. We propose to evaluate the effects of quinacrine on PVL and the mechanisms by 77a5ca646e
